PREFATORY NOTE.

THE portion of the Dictionary occupied with the letter E contains 9,249 Main words, 1,813 Subordinate words, 923 Special combinations, and 756 Obvious combinations: total 12,741. Of the 9,249 Main words, 2,409, or 26 per cent., are marked as obsolete, and 319, or  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., as alien or imperfectly naturalized.

The section of the English vocabulary included in the present half-volume is remarkable for the extremely small proportion of native English words which it contains, as compared with the large number of words adopted from French (many of which are obsolete), and of derivatives from Greek and Latin. A feature of the words beginning with E that will at once attract attention is the unusual abundance of technical terms belonging to modern science. It has often been difficult to determine whether particular words of this class should be inserted or not; and probably no two critics would entirely agree in their lists of deficiencies or redundancies in this respect. While care has been taken to ensure the utmost possible accuracy in the explanation of the scientific terms given, it must be remembered that the concern of an English Dictionary is with their origin and history as words, not with the minute description of the things which they represent. So far as possible, modern words of this kind have been traced back to the authors by whom they were formed, and the inventor's own statements as to the etymology and the reason for which the name was given have, when it seemed necessary, been quoted.

Among the articles in which the current etymological statements are corrected or supplemented may be mentioned those on the words each, eagre, Easter, Easterling, earnest, eddish, eel, either, elope, ember, embracer<sup>2</sup>, encrinus, engineer, enker, enlist, enough, entellus, enthusiasm, entice, entropy, epergne, ephah, epicure, era, ermine, errand, errant, essera, esurine, euonymus, euphroe, even sb., evening, ever, excise, extra. New etymological information has also been given in many of the articles on prefixes and suffixes, which are here extraordinarily numerous. Among the words of interesting history or sense-development are economy, ecstasy, edge, effluvium, electricity, element, elocution, embezzle, emperor, emphasis, enchant, engage, engine, English, entail, entertain, enthusiasm, entire, esquire, essence, establishment, estate, esteem, estrange, eternal, ether, euphuism, evangelical, evict, evidence, evident, evil, evolution, exact adj., excelsior, exception, exchange, exchequer, exclusive, execute, exercise, exhaust, exhibition, exorbitant, expedite, expense, expire, explain, explode, express, expression, exquisite, extend, exterminate, extenuate, extravagant, eye.

The treatment of the pronunciation has presented some special difficulties. An unusually large proportion of the words dealt with belong to the class that are much better known in their written than in their spoken form. The difficulties connected with the orthocpy of words of this kind have already been referred to by Dr. Murray in the Preface to Vol. I; but the words beginning with E are perplexing for a reason peculiar to themselves, the initial e in unaccented syllables being pronounced variously in the same word, not only by different speakers, but sometimes even by the same speaker. In words beginning with unstressed e before two (written) consonants, like effect, ellipse, entail, the initial sound is in rapid or familiar pronunciation almost universally (e); but in careful or syllabic pronunciation the majority of educated speakers would retain the older sound of (e), except before s. On this ground it has been thought best to use the symbol (e) in the notation of words like those above quoted, and (e) in that of words like essential, estate; but it should be understood that the sound expressed by the latter symbol is in colloquial use always a permissible substitute for an initial unstressed (e). Similar uncertainties exist with regard to the unstressed initial E before a single consonant: in most of the words in which this occurs the pronunciation varies between (e) and (e).

Before being taken in hand by the present editor, the material for the letter E had (in common with that for several other portions of the alphabet) been subedited in 1881-2 under Dr. Murray's direction by the late Mr. P. W. Jacob, who also revised it in 1884-5, incorporating the additional quotations accumulated in the meantime. Hearty acknowledgement is made of the important service thus rendered by Mr. Jacob; and it is a cause of regret that this accomplished scholar did not survive to see the publication of the first of those portions of the work to the preliminary arrangement of which he so zealously devoted the latest years of his life.

Although Dr. Murray is not responsible for any of the faults that may exist in this portion of the work, he has rendered much valuable assistance in its preparation; there are in fact few pages that have not been improved by the adoption of his suggestions. The proofs have been regularly read by Mr. Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., who has furnished many hundreds of important quotations, carrying back the history of words to an earlier date, or exemplifying senses or constructions not sufficiently illustrated; also by Mr. H. Hucks Gibbs, M.P., by the Rev. J. T. Fowler, M.A., of Durham, and by Mr. W. H. Stevenson, who have contributed many valuable annotations. Mr. John Mitchell, Dr. Murray's senior assistant, has also furnished useful remarks on the proofs.

On questions of Teutonic philology important help has been received from Prof. Eduard Sievers. Halle, and Prof. Napier, Oxford: on questions of Romanic philology the advice of Prof. Paul Meyer has been of great value. For information on various special subjects my thanks are due to the following: the Rev. J. C. Atkinson, D.C.L.; Mr. A. Beazeley, C.E.; the Rev. T. E. Bridgett; the Rev. W. Bright, D.D., Canon of Ch. Ch.; Dr. Robert Brown; Mr. A. H. Bullen, M.A.; Mr. Ingram Bywater, M.A., Oxford; Mr. J. S. Cotton, M.A., Editor of The Academy; Mr. P. A. Daniel; Mr. Léon Delbos; Mr. C. E. Littledale, who furnished information or suggestions for some of the earlier articles, are no longer living to receive this acknowledgement of their valued help.

I desire also to express my thanks to the Trustees of the British Museum for granting me special facilities for working in the Library; to the officers of that institution for the readiness which they have shown on all occasions to assist my researches; and to Dr. F. J. Furnivall for constant and important help in many ways. To my assistants, Mr. G. F. H. Sykes, B.A., and Messrs. W. J. Lewis, W. J. Bryan, and H. J. Bayliss, working at Oxford, and Mr. E. Gunthorpe, working with me in the verification of references, etc., at the British Museum, I owe cordial acknowledgements for their zealous and painstaking co-operation. To these names must be added those of Mr. S. A. Strong, M.A., and Mr. F. S. Arnold, M.A., each of whom in succession was for a short period one of my Oxford assistants, but for reasons of health was compelled to withdraw from the work. Special recognition is also due to the valuable services rendered by Mr. A. Erlebach, B.A., in the revision of the proofs.

EMENDATIONS.

Each. The form euych should be deleted, with the quotation 1480-7 under (A.  $\epsilon$ ), in which this occurs, the correct reading being euerych (see EVERY).

Egg-berry. (Egg sb. 7, p. 58.) This is a corrupt form of HAGBERRY, and onght not to have been given here.

Egromancy. The form egremauncey occurs a 1649 in Gregory's Chron. (Camd. Soc. 1876), 183.

Eirant. This form and Errant (omitted in its alphabetical place) see variants of HAURIANT, q. v.

Enhendee. The word is, as stated in the text, a mistake for OF. enheudee; but the misreading occurs in Fr. writers, e.g. Palliot 1664.

Eve-star. The quotation 1691 under this word should be deleted. The word evester occurring there is adapted from the mod. Lat. eucstrum, which seems to have been arbitrarily invented by Paracelsns, and is explained in the Onomasticon of Toxites (1574) to mean, amongst other things, 'the astral body [corpus sidereum] of man, which foretells to us either death or any other evil.'

Eylet-hole, 5b. 1. The following earlier example has been found:—1497 Naval Accts. Hen. VII (1896) 334 Makyng of olyett-hooles with other necessaries for the seid sayles.

PREFACE TO VOLUME III.

THIS volume contains the words beginning with the letters D and E (the latter edited by Mr. H. Bradley). Including the Main words, to which separate articles are devoted (e.g. Day, Eye), the special combinations or compounds, explained and illustrated under the Main words (e.g. day-boy, eye-wash), and the Subordinate entries of distinct forms of words, entered in their alphabetical places with a reference to the Main words under which they are treated and illustrated (e.g. Damaeene, obs. f. DAMSON; Ee, Sc. form of EYE), the number of words amounts to 29,042. The Combinations of simple and obvious meaning (such as day-beam, day-flier, eye-like, eye-syringe), of which lists are given under the Main words without further explanation, but in most cases with illustrative quotations, number 2,750 more, raising the actual total of words included in the volume to 31,792.

These words are thus distributed between the two letters:

	Main Words.	Subordinate words.	Special combinations.	Obvious combinations.	Total.
$\mathbf{D}$	13,478	2,099	1,480	1,994	19,051
$\mathbf{E}$	9,249	1,813	923	756	12,741

Considered as to their status in the language, the Main words are distinguished approximately into those native or fully naturalized, and still eurrent, those now obsolete (marked †), and those considered as alien or imperfectly naturalized (marked ||). The distribution of the Main words is as follows:

	Current.	Obsolete.	Alien.	Total.
D	10,033	3,046	399	13,478
$\mathbf{E}$	6,521	2,409	319	9,249
	16,554	5,455	718	22,727

If to these be added the words in Volumes I and II, we have, for the contents of the first five letters of the alphabet, the following figures:

	Main words.	Subordinate words.	Special combinations.	Obvious combinations.	Total.
A-E	66,254	13,181	10,156	8,017	97,608

That is to say, nearly a hundred thousand words, simple and compound, have already been dealt with in the Dictionary. Of the 66,254 Main words, 47,786 ( $72\frac{1}{10}$  per cent.) are current and native or fully naturalized, 15,952 (24 per cent.) are obsolete, and 2,516 ( $3\frac{1}{10}$  per cent.) alien or imperfectly naturalized.

<sup>1</sup> For the sake of comparison with Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, and with some more recent lexicographical works, the following figures have been carefully compiled for the letter D.

	Johnson.	Encyclopædic.	Century Dict.	Funk's 'Standard.'	Here.
Total words recorded in D	2,684	10,089	10,705	11,181	19,051
Words illustrated by quotations	2,136	5,251	4,977	1,313	16,128
Number of illustrative quotations	6,529	9,178	12,471	1,815	85,446

The number of quotations under D in Richardson's Dictionary, where the first serious effort was made to show the history of words by quotations, is 7,988.

NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Of this volume 740 pages are occupied by the letter D, 488 by E. The contents of the E part are treated of by Mr. Bradley in the Prefatory Note to that letter. Of the D part, the first 75 pages, to the end of DEA-, and the last 200, from DIT- to the end, exemplify fully the composite nature of the modern English vocabulary. Its two main bodies of words, from Teutonic and Romanic, are reinforced by a smaller body from Greek, and interspersed with words in varying numbers from most of the European, many of the Oriental, and some American and African languages. The same elements characterize pages 76 to 396 (DIB- to end of DIR-), where, however, there is a great preponderance of words formed with the Latin (and French) prefix DE-, Latin DI- and DIF- (forms of DIS-), and Greek DI- and DIA-. But pages 379-540 contain an almost solid block of words formed with the Latin prefix DIS-, extending to no fewer than 3,049 main words, and including many of the most important verbs in the language, with their cognate substantives and adjectives. We have only to turn to such words as defer, degrade, delay, depend, determine, detract, differ, discover, disease, dispose, -ition, distance, -ant, distract, distress, district, disturb, to appreciate the practical importance of this element. A strong contrast to this latinized group is afforded by the 66 pages of words in DR-, a combination foreign to Latin, in which therefore the words of Latin derivation are at a minimum, and either go back to Greek or Celtic (Dryad, Druid), or arise from later syncopation, as dress.

Among the more important words of Old English and Norse origin are the great verb Do, to the lexicographer one of the most formidable words in the language, which here occupies 16 columns, DRAW (17 columns), the verbs dare, deal, die, dight, dip, dive, drag, drink, drive, drop, dwell, dye; the substantives DOG (claiming, with its combination, 22 columns), daughter, death, die, door, down (sb., adv., prep., adj. and vb.), draught (and draft), duck, drone; the adjectives dark, dead, deaf, dear, deep, dry, dull, dumb. Among those of French extraction are the verbs defeat, deign, dine, doubt, dress; the substantives dame, damsel, danger, deacon, demesne, diamond, diaper, dinner, dozen, dragon, dragon, dungeon; the adjectives dainty, diligent, DOUBLE (with combinations, 13 columns), due. Among the words of Greek derivation are the medical terms in DIA- so curiously formed from Greek phrases; though now represented in current use only by Diachylon, they were formerly so numerous that their common element dia was itself taken as a word meaning 'medical preparation.' Interesting groups of dia- words are those connected with diaphanous and diathermanous; other important groups from Greek are those in DYNAM-, and DYS-.

Among the words on which new etymological or historical light has been shed, or where the history of special senses has been for the first time worked out, are daffodil, damask, dapple, dean, DEBENTURE, Black DEATH, decoy, demijohn, dene-hole, dengue, DERRING-do, diaper, dicker, diet, dilettante, diocese, diphtheria, DISMAL, DISPATCH, dock, doddered, dolmen, Dom-daniel, dragoon; the military sense of detail, the academic sense of determine, -ation, the philosophical sense of dialectic, the ecclesiastical and political senses of dispense, dispensation, the logical sense of distribution, distributive. Other words of which the English history receives special treatment are dirge, Dane-geld, Dane-law, dauphin, deacon, deist, deity, defenestration, demarcation, demesne, despot, deuce, DEVIL, de-witt, diamond, DICTIONARY, die (dice), discount, distemper and its family, divan (dewan, douane), docket, Doctor's Commons, dodo, doldrum, DOLLAR, domesday, donkey, DUKE, dunce, Dunstable (way), DUTCH, dynamics, dynamo. Attention is called to the etymological articles on the verbs die and do; under DROP sb. there is a note showing the historical relations of the dreep, drip, droop, drop family of words.

The materials for the words from D to Dely were sub-edited for us by Mr. F. T. Elworthy of Wellington, Somerset, with the collaboration of members of his family; the following section, to the end of Dh, by Miss J. E. A. Brown of Further Barton, near Cirencester; a small section, from Dia to Dialysis, by the Rev. W. E. Smith then of Putney; and the remainder by our indefatigable worker, the late Mr. P. W. Jacob of Guildford, part of this having been previously arranged by Mr. J. W. Warre Tyndale of Evercreech. Much of the letter was subsequently revised, with addition of more recent materials, by the Rev. C. B. Mount, M.A. of 14 Norham Road, Oxford, and by Mr. John Dormer, then of Horsham; to the former of these we are also indebted for the detailed investigation of the history of several interesting words; and to the latter for the compilation of the Lists of Special Wants for D, as also for filling many gaps in our quotations for scientific and technical words.

In the 'proof' stage, continuous assistance has been rendered by Lord Aldenham (better known to friends of the Dictionary as Mr. H. Hucks Gibbs), the Rev. Canon Fowler, D.D. of Durham, the Rev.

J. B. Johnston, B.D., of Falkirk, Monsieur F. J. Amours, Glasgow, and, for later parts of D, by Miss Edith Thompson and Miss E. Perronet Thompson, Reigate, and Mr. Russell Martineau, M.A., formerly of the British Museum. But above all, we have to record the inestimable collaboration of Dr. Fitzedward Hall, whose voluntary labours have completed the literary and documentary history of numberless words, senses, and idioms, and whose contributions are to be found on every page; also the unflagging services of Dr. W. C. Minor, which have week by week supplied additional quotations for the words actually preparing for press <sup>1</sup>.

Grateful acknowledgement is made of the generous help of all these contributors and collaborators; as, also, of the contributions of Professor Eduard Sievers of Leipzig to the etymological articles on Teutonic words, and of M. Paul Meyer, Member of the Institute of France, to the solution of difficult points in French etymology. Among others who have given help on particular etymological points, are M. Antoine Thomas of Paris, Dr. W. H. Muller of Leyden, Professor F. Kluge of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, Prof. A. S. Napier, M.A., Prof. Margoliouth, M.A., the Rev. Prof. Driver, D.D., and Mr. J. T. Platts, M.A., of Oxford. Many of the scholars and specialists named in the Preface to Vol. I. have also helped on particular points; special mention is due of Professor Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., Prof. F. W. Maitland. LL.D. of Cambridge, Prof. H. Goudy, D.C.L., LL.D., Prof. T. E. Holland, D.C.L., Oxford, the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, D.D., the late Professor Wallace (of whose ever ready help with logical and philosophical terms a lamentable accident has so lately deprived us), Mr. H. T. Gerrans, M.A., L. Fletcher, Esq., M.A., F.R.S., and the Director of the Royal Gardens, Kew. We have also to acknowledge the substantial help of Prof. Albert Chester of Hamilton College, Clinton, New Jersey, with mineralogical terms; of Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., of Gosport, with the history of medical and pathological words (see diphtheria); of Mr. Barclay Head of the British Museum, with several numismatical words; of Mr. C. W. C. Oman, M.A., with the history of the word duke, and of Prof. Sylvanus P. Thompson, F.S.A., and Prof. R. B. Clifton, F.R.S., with that of Dynamo and Dynamic.

The assistants in the Scriptorium, who have been engaged on the work all through D, are Mr. C. G. Balk, Mr. A. T. Maling, M.A., and Mr. F. J. Sweatman, B.A. In the early part of the letter I had the cooperation also of the late Mr. John Mitchell and of Mr. W. Worrall, B.A. Mr. Mitchell had been on the staff of the Dictionary for more than eleven years; and his sudden and lamented death, caused by a fall when climbing in the Snowdon region, on August 30, 1894, was for certain departments of our work a loss which is not yet repaired. In the later parts of the letter, I have had the assistance of Mr. C. Talbut Onions, M.A., and Mr. A. R. Sewall; and, for certain portions, of Mr. A. Erlebach, B.A. variant of AFFODILL, q. v. The initial d has not been satisfactorily accounted for.

It has been variously suggested as due to childish or playfal distortion, as in Ted for Edward, tante for aunt; to union of the article th' (cf. Corca., Afrodille, Th' Affodill, and north. Eng. t' affadil'); to final d of and, in (e.g.) 'fennell and affodil'; to union of the Dutton or Flemish article, as de affodile the affodil; and to Fr. prep. d' as in Henr d'aphrodille. It is noteworthy that as in Eng. the word has gained a letter, in 16th c. Fr. it sometimes lost one: Littré (s. v. asphodèle) quotes from De Serres (16th c.), 'Des racines d' afrodille', and also 'Decoction de lapace, de frodilles'. A third form dafrodille is quite conceivable.

Affodill and its popular variants daffodil, daffadilly, were originally and properly the Asphodel; then by popular misconception, due apparently to the application to both plants, at their first introduction to England, of the fanciful name Lans tibi (see Turner Libellus B 3 b), it was applied, especially in the popular variations, to species of Narcissus, etc. Botanists, after resisting this misapplication, compromised the matter by retaining affodil for the Asphodel, and accepting the more popular daffodil for Narcissus, Finally affodil was 'rectified' to asfodyl and asphodel, and daffodil restricted in popular use to the Yellow Narcissus or Yellow Daffodil of Eng. fields and gardens.]

Dagger (dæga), sb. Forms: 4- dagger; also 4-5 daggere, Sc. dagare, 5 daggare, 5-6 dager, dagger, daggar, 6 dagger, and to Dag v.?

No such form is known in Old French. Med.L. shows daggarius, arium, erius, ardum (see Du Cange), app. from English, so that the form dagger appears to be really of English formation (?f. Dag v.?, of which however only later instances are known. If the form daggard could be assumed as the original, the word might be an augmentative in ard of F. dague; but, though extracto cultello daggardo occurs in Walsingham, 15th c. (Du Cange), the forms daggarium and dagger are of earlier appearance and better supported.]

As to the OF, word, see M. Gaston Paris in Romana (1889) 460. He shows it to be distinct from OF. deshait evil disposition or condition, sorrow, woe, etc., and suggests the meaning 'God's hate', in primitive Merovingian French *deu hat. In English, the primmry dahet is very rare; the usual dapeit, datheit, dathet are difficult to account for, unless they represent the OF. phrase dathet ait, daat ait, or in pl. dahez, daez, daaz ait, phrase dathet ait, daat ait.

Apparently, the phrase being thus taken for the simple word, the verb had to be added anew, as in OF. dehait ait! ME. dapeit haue! In Robert of Brunne written dapet with dotted b, printed by Hearne as dotted j.!

Dahlia (dē<sup>1</sup>·liă, properly dā·liă). [Named 1791 in hononr of Dahl, a Swedish botanist.]

1. A genus of Composite plants, natives of Mexico, introduced into Europe in 1789, and commonly cultivated in gardens.

In the wild plant the flowers are 'single' with a dull scarlet ray and yellow disk; in the cultivated forms the varieties of colour are very numerons, and the 'double' varieties are distinguished by the remarkable regularity of their flowers, in which florets of the ray completely cover the disk.

Damask rose, a species or variety of rose, supposed to have been originally brought from Da-posed to have been originally brought from Damascus.

Apparently, originally the Rosa gallica var. damascena, a tall shruh with semi-double pink or light-red (rarely white) flowers, cultivated in the East for attar of roses; but this underwent many chaoges under cultivation in the West, and the name has been very variously applied by English authors. According to Miller (1968) the monthly rose, striped monthly, and Fork-and-Lancaster, were supposed to be varieties of the Damask rose. According to Flückiger and Hanbury, Pharmacographia, the name is now applied at Mitcham to a variety of R. gallica with very deep-coloured flowers.

The origin of the Romanic word is obscure; it is generally held (after Diez) to be an adoption of OHG. danson to draw, to stretch out, from which is supposed to have arisen the sense 'to form a file or chain in dancing'. From Romanic the word has been taken (back) in the sense 'dance' into German: MHG. tanzen(11th c), MDu dansen. (OHG. danson was a derivative form from dinsan = Goth. Phissan in at-Phissan to draw towards one.)] provide funds for the protection of England from the Danes, and continued after the Norman Conquest as a land-tax.

The name is not known to occur in OE., and the actual contemporary notices, beginning with Domesday, are mainly of fiscal character. Bromton (14th c.) calls it 'tallagium datum Danis', apparently identifying it with the gafat or tribute paid to the Danes ingg1, and on two subsequent occasions, to buy them off. In the so-called 'Laws of Eadweard' (Schmid 496) it is described as an annual tax to hire mercenaries to resist and put down pirates. This might identify it with the heregyld' 'army-tax' levied by the Danish kings to maintain their army and navy (see O.E. Chron. 1939-40), and said to have been afterwards remitted by Edward the Confessor. Mr. Freeman suggests (Norm. Conq. II. App. Q) 'that Denageld' was a popular name of dislike, originally applied to the payments made to buy off the Danes, and thence transferred to these other payments made to Danish and other mercenary troops, from the time of Thurkill onwards'. The Danegeld was levied as a land-tax by the Norman kings; it disappears under that name after 1163, but in fact continued under the name of tallage.

(The name is found in Turner 1538, but only the earlier name Wallwort or Wellewort, O.E. weakuyrt, is given in Simon. Barthol, of 14th c., and Alphita c. 1450; Rous also, who died 1491, in relating the legend, has only the name Walwort; so that the names Danewort, Danewed, Dane's blood, etc. can hardly have belonged to early tradition. While suggested in part by the abundance of the plant at certain spots historically or traditionally associated with slaughter, there was also an element of fanciful etymology in explaining the Latin name Ebulus from ebullire to bubble forth, with reference to the flowing of blood. The mutual relations of these two centuries earlier. The mutual relations of these and the derivation and etymological development of the whole group are, from the want of data, still uncertain. The primary meaning of dappted was 'spotted, specked, blotched', which might arise either from a vb. 'to spot' or a sb. = 'spot, blotch'. A possible connexion is the Icel. depill (found in 13th c.) 'spot, dot'; according to Vigfusson 'a dog with spots over the eyes is also called depill'. This is app. a dim. of dapi pool: cf. mod. Norw. dape. depel moddy pool, pond, dub; MLG. Since dapple tiself is exemplified in any grammatical capacity (the only form known to be of equal age being the ppl, adidappled, it is difficult to conjecture whence or how the compound was formed. In such combinations, the first element is usually a sb.: e.g. in apple-grey, iron-grey, sky-blue, snow-white, etc.; lut it is difficult to attach any analogous meaning to 'spot-grey', if we suppose dapple here to be the sb. The Germanic languages generally have a combination meaning 'apple-grey': viz. ON. apalgrár 'dapple-grey, i. e. apple-grey, any the streaky colour of an apple '(Vigfusson), Sw. apel-grá, Norw. apel-gra, Da. abildgraa, pied, piebald; OHG. aphelgra' glaucus' (Grimm), MHG. aphelgra', Ger. aphelgrau' dapple-grey'. MAGAOHHMM yablochnyl dappled, f. yabloko apple; all said esp. of the coats of horses. It is not easy to believe that 'dapple-grey', inchracer, these words, has no connexion with 'apple-grey', their actual translation; the explanation may be that dapple-grey was a mixture of DAPPLED spotted, taken as the sense-equivalent of Norse apal-gra, and its Teutonic equivalents. This would account at once for the difficulty in analysing dapple-in this combination, and for its presence here before its appearance as an independent word.]

Darbar: see Durbar.

Darby (dā bi). A southern (not the local) pronunciation of Derby, the name of an English town and shire, which was formerly also sometimes so spelt. Hence an English personal surname, and an appellation of various things named after the place or some person of that surname.

The Gentl. Mag. (1735) V. 153 has under the title 'The joys of love never forgot: a song', a mediocre copy of verses, beginning 'Dear Chloe, while thus beyond measure, You treat me with doubt and disdain', and continuing in the third stanza 'Old Darby, with Joan by his side, You've often regarded with wonder: He's dropsical, she is sore-eyed, Yet they're never happy asunder'. This has usually been considered the source of the names, and various conjectures have been made, both as to the author, and as to the identity of 'Darby and Joan', but with no valid results. It is possible that the names go back to some earlier piece, and as Darby is not a common English surname, it may have originated in a real person. There is also a well-known 19th c. song of the name.

Dare (dē a), v.1 Pa. t. durst (dvist', dared Dare (dea), v. Pa. t. durst (darst) dared (dead); pa. pple. dared. Forms: see below. One of the interesting group of Teutonic preterite-present verbs, of which the extant present is an original preterite tense: see Can, Dow, etc. OE. durran, pres. dearr, durron, pa. dorste, = OS. gidurran, -dar, -durrun, -dorsta, Ml.G. doren, dar, doren, dorste, OFris, dûra, (dûr or dor), dorste, of the dearth of the distribution of the dark of the da OHG. gi-turran, -tar, -turrun, -torsta, pa. pple. gitorran, MIIG. turren, tar, turren, torste, subj. törste, Goth. ga-daursan, -dars, -daursun, subj. -daursjau, -daursta; belonging originally to the -autrsau, -autrsau; belonging originally to the third ablaut series ders-, dars-, durs-, Aryan dhei s-, dhars-, dhrs-: ef. Skr. dhrsh-, perf. dadhārsha, to be bold, Gr. θηρσ-, θρασ- in θρασύν bold, θορσών to be bold, OSlav. drivate to be bold, dare. In ON., the word is wanting, its sense being supplied by the weak verb pora. It is also lost in mod.Ger. and Du.; in MDu. it appears to have run together with the verb dorven, =OE. purfan to need (see THAR); hence in Du., durven is to dare; and Ger. durfen in some of its uses approaches the sense 'dare'. These two verbs have also fallen together under a d form in some Frisian dialects; and in ME, there was some confusion between them, dar being sometimes written for thar, while, on the other hand, th- forms (some of them at least from Norse) appear with the sense of dar: see A. 9 below.

Norse) appear with the sense of dar: sec A. 9 below. The original 3rd sing, pres. he dare, and pa. t. durst, remained undisturbed to the modern period, in which the transitive senses (B. II.) were developed; but early in the 16th c, the new forms dares, dared, appeared in the south, and are always used in the transitive senses, and now also in the intransitive sense when followed by to. In the original construction, followed by the infinitive without to, dare, durst are still in common use (esp. in the negative 'he dare not', 'he durst not'); and most writers prefer 'he dare go', or 'he dares to go', to 'he dares go'. The northern dialects generally retain 'he dare, he durst', and writers of northern extraction favour their retention in literary English when followed by the simple infinitive without to.]

Darn (dām), v. Forms: 7-8 dern, dearn, 7-darn; 9 Sc. dern. [Derivation unknown.

The verb appears about 1600, and becomes at once quite common: it may be that this particular way of repairing a hole or rent was then introduced. The form suggests relationship to Dern (later darn) secret, hidden, and its verb dern, darn to conceal, put out of sight; but satisfactory connecting links between the two have not yet been found. On the other hand the Celtic derivation suggested by Wedgwood is absolutely inadmissible. Welsh darn' piece, fragment' has no association with darning or mending in any way, and the sense 'patch' given by Owen Pughe is correct only in the sense that a 'piece' may be used to patch. The Welsh darnio hosan would mean 'to eat a stocking' to levels darn's piece, may be used to patch. The Welsh darnio hosan would mean 'to eat a stocking to pieces' with a knife; 't darn a stocking' is creithio hosan. (D. Silvan Evans, and Prof. Rhŷs.)

1. A deleterious grass, Lolium temulentum, which in some countries grows as a weed among corn.

Known first as the English name for the lolium of the Vulgate: see Cockle $b.\tilde{2}_2$. The grass is now rare in England, but appears to have been much more common formerly when seed-corn was largely imported from the Mediterranean regions, where the weed abounds. It is now held to be deleterious only when infested by ergot, to which it is particularly liable.

ter, is doughter, still used in 16th c., and now represented by Sc. dochter, dowchter, north. Eng. dowter. The form daughter appeared in the 16th c. (substituted in Cranmer's ed. of the Bible for Tindale's and Coverdale's doughter, whence in all later versions, and always in Shakspere and later writers). It appears to be of southern origin, and analogous

It appears to be of southern origin, and analogous to the southern phonetic development of bought, sought, thought: a Wells will of 1531 has dahtorrs: cf. the mod. Somerset and Devon (dā'təi).

In OE. the dative sing, was dehter; genitive dohtor in use to the 16th c. The plural shows a variety of forms, viz. OE. dohtor, vir. er (like the sing.), dohtru, dohtra, Northumb. dohter, dohtero; the first of these app. did not survive the OE. stage; the form in vi, vi, is represented in early ME. by Layamon's dohtere, dohtre, the first of these app. did not survive the OE. stage; the form in vi, vi, is represented in early ME. by Layamon's dohtere, dohtre, the first of these app. Ormin has dohttress, and the later text of Layamon dohtres, which is always found in northern ME., and became the standard form. An umlaut plural dester appears in the West Midland Alliterative Poems of 14th c, and the Troy-book of 14th c, and the Troy-book of 14th c, and to cause elsewhere with inflexional endings, dehtren, desteres: cf. brether, brethren. The unfixedness of the furm is seen in this, that the earlier text of Layamon has both dohlere and dohlere, the later both dohleren and dohleres; the MSS. of Chaucer also show both donghtren and dohleres; the MSS. of Chaucer also show both donghtren and dohleres; the MSS. of Chaucer also show both donghtren and dohleren, the Alliterative Poems dester and desteres.

With the OE, plural forms, cf. OFris, dohlere and dohleren, OHG, tohlere, tohleren, chottern, MHG, with unitaut, tohler, Ger, tokhler, LG, dechter. The original Teutonic nom. pl. was *dohlers, in early Norse runes dohlera, whence regularly Norse ddetr, deiter; a corresponding OE. *darhter, *dehter* is not found, but the ME. West Midland dessemany be its descendant. The other forms in the various languages are later, and analogical. For OE. dohler, *dohler, *ra, see the similar forms under Bronner: it is possible that those in *ru, *ra, northern *em, are assimilated to *so, *or stems like lombru, *ra, *ero, ME. dosfren, desfren exemplify the usual passage of vowel plurals in early southern ME. into the *en type, and Ormin's dohrers the early avecuadancy of *es plurals in the north and midlands.]

Originally a title attached to certain seigneuries: Dauphin of the Viennois, Dauphin of Auvergne. According to Littré, the name Dauphin, borne by the lords of the Viennois, was a proper name Delphinus (the same word as the name of the fish), whence the province subject to them was called Dauphind. Humbert 111, the last lord of Dauphind, on ceding the province to Philip of Valois in 1349, made it a condition that the title should be perpetuated by being borne by the eldest son of the French king.

Daut, dawt (dot), v. Sc. Also 6-8 date. [Etymology unknown.

If dant, dawt, is, as it appears to be, the proper form, it ought to represent an original dalt: cf. Sc. faut, mant, saut, etc.; but the two 16-17th c. examples uf date from Scotch writers of English make even this doubtful. Dalt suggests Gael, dalta foster-child; but, though the word appears to be exclusively Scotch, there is no evidence pointing to a Gaelic origin. Connexion with Dote, doat is excluded by the fact that Sc. au, av, does not answer to Eng. d from any source. Cf. also DAUNT v. 6.]

10e-, prefix. The Latin adverh and preposition, used in combination with verbs, and their deriva-used in combination with verbs, and their derivatives. A large number of verbs so formed lived on in French as popular words, or were taken over into that language in earlier or later times as learned words, and thence came into English, as decresc-ere, décreis-tre, decrease ; defend-ere, défendre, defend; dēsīderāre, dēsīre-r, desīre. In later times English verbs, with their derivative adjec-tives and substantives, as also participial adjectives and substantives without any verbs, have been adapted directly from Latin, or formed from Latin elements, without the intervention of French. The following are the chief uses in Lat. and Eng.

I. As an elymological element. In the senses: A. AS an etymological element. In the senses:

1. Down, down from, down to: as dependere to hang down, Defend (Defendent, ence, etc.): deponère to lay down, Defone, Defonse; deprimère to press down, DeFRESS; déscendère to climb down, Descent: devonère to gulp down, Devour. So of English formation, Defenax.

2. Off, away, aside: as declinare to turn aside, Decline; deductre to lead away, Deduce; defendere to ward off, Defent; dependere to carry off, Defent; designare to mark off, Designare to carry off, Defent; designare to mark off, Designare; designare to mark off, Designare; designare to make over, Delegare; desprecare to pray away, Defence thoroughly, on and on, away; also methodically, formally: as declaration on a sway, Declaim; deldicare to make quite clear, Declare; dendare to strip quite bare, Denoue; defelorare to weep as lost, Deflore; deretinquire to abandon completely, Dereting despoilare to spoil utterly, Despot. b. To exhaustion, to the dregs: as decoquere to boil dumn or away, Decoct; deliquescere to melt away, Dellocesce.

pletely, Draelict; despolière to spoil utterly, Despoil.

b. To exhaustion, to the dregs: as decoquére to boil down or away, Decoct; deliquêncére to melt away, Deliquescen.

4. In a bad sense, so as to put down or subject to some indignity: as décipère to take in, Decrive; délidière to make game of, Deliube; déridère to laugh to scorn, Dearbe; délestàri to abominate, Detrest.

5. In late L., décompositus was used by the grammarians in the sense 'formed or derived from a compound (word)', passing later into that of 'compounded over again, doubly or further compounded'; in this sense the word has in modern times been taken into chemistry, botany, etc. (see Decomostre, Decompound), and the prefix has been similarly used in other words, as Decomplex, Demixtures.

6. In Latin, dê- had also the function of undoing or reversing the action of a verb, e.g. armare to disgrace, jungère to Join, dējungère to unyoke, vélâre to verl, dê-vélâre to unveil, and of forming verbs of similar type from substantives, as deartuare to dismember, from artus member, joint, dêcollâre to behead, from collum neck, dêcortidare to deprive of bark, from corticem bark, déflôrâre to rob of its flowers, from fôrem flower. A like notion was usually expressed in classical Latin by the prefix dis-; e.g. cingère to disagree, jungère to oungird, convenire to agree, disconvenire to disagree, jungère to join, disjungère to disson, diff bulâre to unclasp, dilbéreûre to uncoslet, discalecâtus unshod. In tale 1., dâr., Romanic des. became the favoured form; and although some L. words in dê-lived on, or were by scholars adopted into the Romanic langs., all new compounds were formed with des., and many even of the Latin words in déwere refashioned in Romanic des. decarative, descorticare, décarative, décontine, décârque, decondre, décondre, descorte, descaration, of formăre, descapitare, decondre, descaration, des formare, des descapitare, descorticare, descapitare, descorticare, descapitare, descorticare, descapitare, descorticare, descapitare, descorticar regular use with Northern writers (dede), and still dialectal in Scotch (deid, pronounced did), esp. in certain locutions, e. g. tired to dead (deid), to be the dead (deid) of any one. Also in many combinations, as dead-bell, dead-candle, dead-rattle, dead-spoke, dead-thraw, etc. For examples of the simple word, see the  $\beta$  forms under the various senses of Death sb.; for the combinations see under the standard English forms DEATH-BELL, DEATH-THROE, etc.

In some instances it is difficult to decide whether dead in combination is the sb. = death, or the ordinary adj. And it is evident that later writers have often used phrases and combinations containing the sb, with the notion that it was the adj. Thus dead-bell could easily be understood as the bell of the dead, or rung for the dead, dead-sweat as the sweat characteristic of the dead.

1. A slice sawn from a log of timber (now always of fir or pine), and usually understood to be more than seven inches wide, and not more than three thick; a plank or board of pine or fir-wood.

In the timber trade, in Great Britain, a deal is understood to be 9 inches wide, not more than 3 inches thick, and at least 6 feet long. If shorter, it is a deal-end; if not more than 7 inches wide, it is a BATTEN. In N. America, the standard deal (to which other sizes are reduced in computation) is 12 feet long, 11 inches wide, and 2½ inches thick. By carpenters, deal of half this thickness (14 inches) is called vibiole deal; of half the latter ($\frac{1}{2}$ inch 15th deal.

The word was introduced with the importation of sawn boards from some Low German district, and, as these consisted usually of fir or pine, the word was from the first associated with these kinds of wood.

anity; see CHRISTIANITY 4. (There were also urban deans (decani urbani): see Kennett Par. Antiq. II. 339.)

The rural dean had, in England till the Reformation, and in France till the Revolution, large powers of visitation, adiministration, and jurisdiction, which are still retained in some Roman Catholic countries. In England the office and title became almost obsolete from the 16th c., but have, since 1835, been generally revived for purposes of diocesan organization. See Dansey, Hora Decanica Rurales, 1835. (Kennett, Du Cange, etc., have cited decanus criscopi in this sense from the 'Laws of Edward the Confessor' xxvii; hut episcopi is an interpolation not in the original text, the decanus spoken of being really in sense 2 above.)

Dean of Peculiars: one invested with the charge of a peculiar, i. e. a particular church, parish, or group of parishes which is exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese within which it is situated, e.g. the Dean of Battle in Sussex. Such is also the Dean of the Chapels Royal in England (St. James's and Whitehall); in Scotland the Deans of the Chapel Royal are six clergymen of the Ch. of Scotl., who receive a portion of the revenues formerly belonging to the Chapel Royal of Holyrood.

Dean of the Arches: the lay judge of the Court of Arches, who has peculiar jurisdiction over thirteen London parishes called a deanery, and exempt from the authority of the bishop of London.

The title of one or more resident fellows appointed to supervise the conduct and studies of the junior members and to maintain discipline among them, to supervise the conduct and studies of the junior members and to maintain discipline among them, to present them for graduation, etc.

The office came originally from that of the monastic dean, and was disciplinary; one important function of the dean in early times was to preside at the disputations of the scholars, and in the Oxford colleges of the new foundation deans were appointed in the different faculties, e.g. at New College, two in Arts, one in Canon Law, one in Civil Law, and one in Theology, who presided at the disputations of the students in these faculties; from the end of the 16th e.g., it became customary also in most colleges for the dean to present for degrees. At present the functions pertaining to discipline, attendance at chapel, graduation, etc., are sometimes discharged hy a single dean, alone or in conjunction with a sub-warden, vice-president, or other vice-gerent, sometimes distributed among two or three deans; hence the offices of senior and junior dean, or sub-dean, dean of arts, dean of divinity, dean of agrees, existing in some colleges.

These uses with a verb suggest that dear represents or implies a fuller dear Lord! Thus dear knows! is exactly equivalent to the Lord or God knows!; cf. also the elliptical Save us! Help us! † Dear, dere, a.2 poetic. Obs. or arch. Forms: I dior, déor, 3-5 dere, 6-7 deere, deare, 7-dear. [OE. déor; not known in the cognate langs., and of uncertain etymology.

I dior, déor, 3-5 dere, 6-7 deere, deare, 7-dear. [OE. dlor; not known in the cognate langs., and of uncertain etymology.

By some held to be intimately related to OE. dlor animal (see Deer). By others thought to contain the same radical firm as Deaa a., and to differ only in the stem-suffix ("deur-o.). In OE., from the levelling of o. stems and jostems, dlor was formally distinguishable from dlore only in the nom. sing. (of all genders), the acc. sing. neuter, and nom. sing. (of all genders), the acc. sing. neuter, and nom. acc. pl. neuter, which had dlor, as against dlore, dloru (o). Hence, when the final e was lost or mute in ME., the two words became entirely identical in form. But in OE., their senses appear to have been quite distinct; and, in later times, the sense of dere, dear, from dlor was highly incongruous with those developed from dlore (though intermediator connecting links of meaning also arose). This difference of sense is a serious objection to the view that the two words are merely different formations from the same base, as in the pairs strong strenge, weord vierde, etc., where the two forms agree in sense. The ultimate etymology has been discussed by Karsten, Mod. Lang. Notes, 1892, 345.]

Common in OE. poetry, but found in no prose writing. In ME. poetry, not known in southern writers, but in the East-Midland Genesis & Exodus, the West Midland Allit. Poems, Gavain & Green Knight, Piers Plowman, and the metrical Destruction of Troy (all these except the first being alliterative); it then appears in Spenser (by whom it was perhaps revived) occurs frequently in Shakspere, in 17th c. poets, and archaically in Shelley. By these later writers it was probably conceived of only as a peculiar poetical sense of Deaa a., and there are uses in Shakspere evidently associated with both sense-groups.

Europe near the middle of the 14th c., and caused great mortality in England in 1348-9; sometimes also including the recurrences of the epidemic in 1360 and 1379.

The name 'black death' is modern, and was app. introduced into English history by Mrs. Penrose (Mrs. Markbam) in 1823, and into medical literature by Babington's transl. of Hecker's Der Schwarze Tod in 1833. In earlier writers we find the pestilence, the flague, great pestilence, great death, or in distinction from later visitations the Jurste moreyn, the first pestilence; Latin chroniclers have petitis, pestilentia, epidemia, mortalitis. The distinctive magna mortalitas, great mortality' or 'death', and its equivalents, prevailed in many languages: Ger. das gresse sterben, LGer. de grote dot, Flem. de groete doet, Da. den store død or mandøsth, Swed. (1402) store dødhin, later stordøden, digerdøden (thick or frequent mortality), Norweg. (14th c.) manndanði himn mikli; cf. lt. martalega grande, F. la grande pette, etc. The epithet 'black' is of uncertain origin, and not known to be contemporary anywhere. It is first found in Swedish and Danish róth c. chroniclers (swarta dødhen, den sørte død). Hence, in German, Schlözer in 1773 used der schwarze Tod in reference to Iceland, and Sprengel in 1794 took it as a general appellation. From modern German the name has passed into Dutch (de zwaarte død) and English, and has influenced French (la peste noire). The quots. 1758 and 1780 below are translations from Danish and Swedish through German, and refer not to the pestilence of 1348, which did not reach Iceland, but to a later visitation in tao-3, known at the time as plagan mortalitate in anglia, quæ a modernis vocatur prima pestilentia. 1758 tr. Horrebow's Nat. Hist. Iceland in Gentl. Mag. XXVIII. 79 In the 14th century a disease called the Sorte død, or black death, destroyed almost all the inhabitants in the place [Iceland]. 1780 tr. (c1600) F. débauch-er, in OF. destaucher (13-14th c.) to entice away from the service of one's master, seduce from duty, etc. Of obscure derivation. approach: see the sb. See also DEBOISE.

F. debaucher is, according to Littré and Hatzfeld, derived from a sb. bauche, of which the precise sense and origin are according to the latter unknown; according to the former it = 'a place of work, workshop', so that desbaucher would mean orig. 'to draw away from the workshop, from one's work or duty': so Diez. Cotgr. has bauche, 'course of stones or bricks in building', baucher 'to chip, hew, or square timber, etc.; also to ranke, order, array, lay euenly'; hence desbaucher might primarily mean 'to disorder, bring into disarray or disorder'. The sense 'draw away from service or duty' appears however to be the earliest in French, though that of 'corrupt', had also been developed before the word was taken into English.]

In OF, the spelling was sometimes assimilated to Latin decepte, as decepte, whence in Eng. deceipte. But in both langs, the p was mute; the oldest Gower MSS. have deceipte, deceite, but the word rimes with streite (strail); the ordinary ryth c. pronunciation rimed it with ait, as in Wither a 1667 bait deceit; cf. the common 16th c. spellings in sait, sate, ecat. The narrowing of ē to ī came later. In OF, the prefix dewas sometimes changed to des- (see De- I. 6), which became very common in ME., and was here, moreover, in the general alteration of the French form des- back to the Latin dis-, subjected to the same change, so as to give, in 15-16th c., such odd spellings as dis-ceat, dis-sait, dis-sate (all meaning digst): cf. In sense 1, proh. a. MDu. dec (neuter) roof, covering, cloak, pretext (app. from decke:—OTeut. pakjo<sup>m</sup>, from same root as Deck v.): cf. Kilian' decke operimentum, lodis—deckes/operimentum, opertorium, tegumen, tegumentum, tegmen, as Deck v.): cf. Kilian 'decke operimentum, lodix = decksel operimentum, opertorium, tegumen, tegumentum, tegmen, stragulum'; also mod. Du. dek bed-covering, horse-cloth. But in the nautical sense, 2, the word is not known in Du. before 1675-81, when dek (neuter) appears as a synonym of verdek, quoted in the nautical sense in 1640, but recorded by Kilian, 1599, only in the general sense 'tegumen, velmen'. Thus, deck in the nautical sense, appears to be known in Eng. 160 years earlier than in Dutch. It may be simply a specific application of the general sense 'covering', or it may come more inmediately from the MDu. sense 'roof.'] planks, or (in iron ships) of iron plating usually covered with planks.

The primary notion was 'covering' or 'roof' rather than 'floor': see quots, 1550 and 1624, and cf. 1466 in sense 1, where the 'dekke for the spynas' or pinnace, may have been a covering of canvas, tarpaulin, or the like. In early craft there was a deck only at the stern, so that 16th c. writers sometimes use deck as equivalent to poop. In Elyot (1338), whence in Cooper, Huloet, and Baret, deck is erroncously made the equivalent of prora, instead of puppis.

[Decoy, in all its senses (exc. 4a) and combinations, was preceded by a simple form Coy  $sb.^1$  (known in 1621), a. Du. kooi of the same meaning. Thus represent and a residential with x and ing. Thus senses 1 and 3 are identical with 1 and 3 of Cov; sense 2 is a fig. use of 1; 4 b. and 5 are closely related to 3. The combinations decoy-bird, -dog, -duck, -man, etc., were preceded generally by the forms coy-bird, -dog, -duck, -man, etc. It is thus evident that de-coy is a derivative, compound, or extension, of Coy sb.; but the origin of the deis undetermined.

It has been variously conjectured to be the prefix De., the Dutch article in de kooi 'the coy' or 'decoy', the second half of Du. eende in eende-kooi' duck-coy', and an obscuration of duck itself in duck-coy, which is indeed found in the 17th c., and (what is notable) not merely as the sb., but as the vb. (see below). Yet we do not find it as the earlier form, which suggests that it is really a later spelling of oppular etymology. The likelihood that decoy is the Du. de kooi has been forcibly urged by C. Stoffel in Englische Studien X. (1887) 180. But direct evidence is wanting. And, since Decoy 36. appears to be an entirely distinct word, being much older in the language than either this word or coy itself, and was probably still in use when coy was introduced from Dutch, it is possible that the latter was made into decoy under the influence of that earlier word. It is to be noted also that the sense 'sharper', 4 a below, actually appears earlier than any other, literal or figurative, and may possibly not be a sense of this word at all, but an independent and earlier cant or slang term; if so, it may also have influenced the change of coy to decoy.]
